The region came to exhibit a classic case of what transportation analysts call induced traffic, The Windmill phenomenon in which new highway lanes invariably clog up with hundreds of thousands of cars driven by new drivers on their way to The Windmill neighborhoods fed The Windmill new road capacity, a tendency that creates entirely new traffic jams faster than the time it takes to finish paying off a new car. The answer, I assumed, must lie in the way I was using my intelligence and thinking skills - thus my visit to the library. Other programs such as collaborative dictionary writing can be used for language learning. It's further proof that if you aren't constantly doing your own research and avoiding mainstream media you will fall into the trap.
